

Abstract

Recent work shows that scoring methods (weighted voting) are very sensitive to the weights used, in theory. We analyze the results of Most Valuable Player voting in baseball as a test of the practical relevance of this work. We find that Most Valuable Player rankings are indeed quite dependent on the particular scoring method in use.