

ABSTRACT

This review article argues the political bias of neoclassical historiography in canonizing the founding fathers of modern economics. While it examines a particular instance in the treatment of Alfred Marshall, it identifies certain general circumstances that condition the historian in giving vent to the bias in question.