

ABSTRACT

We study how immigration policies that impose capital and skill requirements would be determined under majority voting when natives differ in their wealth and vote for policies that maximize their income. We also consider political outcomes when the economy grows, immigration is continuous and immigrants gradually acquire voting rights.